Stratus board to stockholders: Resist investor's proposals

By Gary Dinges – American-Statesman Staff

Highlights

- California billionaire Carl Berg owns about 17 percent of Stratus shares.
- Board asks shareholders to reject Berg's proposals, saying they would 'completely derail' recent momentum.

The board of Austin-based developer Stratus Properties Inc. is urging stockholders to stay the course and resist calls from one very vocal investor who is pushing for major changes.

That investor, California billionaire Carl Berg, owns about 17 percent of Stratus Properties' shares. In recent weeks Berg has made public his desire for Stratus to be sold and has also called for two board members – Charles Porter and Stratus president and CEO Beau Armstrong – to be removed.

In a letter sent Friday, the Stratus board of directors asked shareholders to reject Berg's proposals, saying they would "completely derail" recent momentum. A Stratus shareholder meeting is scheduled for June 6 in Austin.

In particular, the letter mentions Stratus buying out its partner in the W Austin Hotel and Residences, its continued development of H-E-B-anchored shopping centers in the Austin area and elsewhere across the state and work on a new mixed-use development in Southwest Austin.

"After years of working on entitlements, with the patience and support of our shareholders, the company now has a unique and valuable asset base that can be clearly understood, and valued, by the market," Armstrong said. "We are now in an excellent position to evaluate our strategic alternatives. The company is solidly profitable, we have a proven history of very successful projects and our returns have beaten the S&P, the Dow Jones and our peer group over the last five years."

This month, Stratus announced it had engaged a financial adviser, Hentschel & Co., to "explore a full range of strategic alternatives" for the company. Possibilities could include a sale of Stratus, divesting some assets, repurchasing shares or continuing with the developer's current long-term plans.

"Mr. Berg's initiation of a proxy contest urging a fire sale of the company is ill-timed, an enormous waste of resources and counter-productive to the process we have initiated to methodically evaluate our strategic alternatives, with the assistance of an expert financial advisor, for the benefit of all of our stockholders," Armstrong said. "It's hard to sell your house while someone is throwing rocks at it."

Berg and the Stratus board have clashed before, Armstrong said.

“Years ago, when the company was working collaboratively with the city, neighborhoods and environmental leaders over our development plans, Mr. Berg was very critical of the concessions that were made,” Armstrong said. “We believe the results have proven to be the right decision. The strong team we have in place has the experience, relationships and regulatory knowledge that is vital to successful development of the properties. To give Mr. Berg any control over the company at this stage would be a major step backward.”

The two director nominees Berg is backing to replace Armstrong and Porter “have little or no experience as directors of public companies or with the development of real estate in Austin,” Armstrong said.

“Although Mr. Berg’s investment has realized significant value since his original purchase of our stock, he clearly would like to sell his interest in the company,” Armstrong said. “Given the size of his position, that would be difficult to do in the near term, absent a fire sale, given the limited liquidity of our micro-cap stock. A prompt sale would result in near-term value, but we think the properties can attain far more value if we strategically develop them before marketing them for sale.

“The early results from our five-year plan have exceeded our expectations. We think it is a mistake to pursue a strategy for one person’s narrow interests. We have a duty to protect the long-term interests of all stockholders, regardless of whether they have a large or small investment in the company.”

This isn’t Berg’s first battle over an Austin-based, publicly traded company. In 2012, he ended his years-long financial support for Valence Technologies, a move some shareholders blamed for sending the company into bankruptcy.
